Bipolar disorder explained: mania and hypomania defined - Mania & hypomania defined - Bipolar disorder explained - Bipolar disorder - Black Dog Institute

Example: Believing people are following them as they walk down the street, or that someone is out to hurt them or someone they know.

Hallucinations Telltales of Substance-Induced Psychotic Disorder 292.12 - PCP Intoxication

Hallucinations are also seen in mania and they can occur in any sense organ (i.e. hearing, taste, sight, sensation). The commonest hallucinations occurring in mania are auditory. Sometimes the experience of having hallucinations can propel the person to seek an explanation for their presence and this can fuel the development of a delusional belief. The different types of hallucinations that can occur are shown below:

Auditory Hallucinations

Hearing things (e.g. sounds of footsteps or voices). These can be a single voice or several, male or female, be familiar or unfamiliar. The voice(s) can call the person's name, tell them to do things, comment on what the person is doing, or if more than one voice, can talk to each other about the person. Hallucinations are normally perceived as coming from outside the person's head but occasionally people hear them inside the head (similar to the person's own thoughts).

Olfactory hallucinations

Smelling things. Can be pleasant or unpleasant. This can be a signal that there is another physical problem and would warrant a thorough physical examination and review by a specialist physician.

Gustatory Hallucination

Having unusual tastes in the mouth. Again this can be a signal that they is another physical problem and would warrant a thorough physical examination and review by a specialist physician.

Tactile Hallucinations

Feeling sensations on the skin (e.g. something is crawling over them). Again this can be a signal that there is another physical problem and would warrant a thorough physical examination and review by a specialist physician. Commonly this occurs in a drug withdrawal state.

Somatic Hallucinations

These are feeling sensations deep within the body and can be very unpleasant.

Visual Hallucinations

Seeing things that aren't really there (e.g. seeing people or shadows). They can become quite complex with people seeing whole scenes but are uncommon in 'pure' mania and are more commonly associated with some underlying physical or organic problem.

Q And you also told him that you have visual perception problems periodically? A: One of the strange things about what was going on before I went in, for example, when I was in the hospital I was experiencing distortions in vision. — p. 205

Select quotations from KES/bb Recommitment Hearing 5/24/03

Q In fact, you told Dr. Povinelli you hear voices in gibberish, at times they tell you to hurt yourself, but they're still there? A I don't believe they're telling me to hurt myself. — p. 205

Q Olfactory problems as well? You indicated you had strange smells of sulpha? A Yes. My memory is not very good about this recent incident. — p. 206

Ms. Cocchiola raised the issue of would it be paranoid to think that your water was poisoned... My sense of flavor was shot by this infection. And everything seemed to taste bad to me. — p. 182 (re: psychotic episode in 2002)