I wish I hadn't seen the code underlying the Apple SSL/TLS bug, because I can't unsee it.

Jessica Brisbane Yeah, if they made such a basic mistake in a such an important module it makes you wonder what mistakes they've made elsewhere.

My impression?

It was "no mistake."

"... it makes you wonder what mistakes they've made elsewhere."

Like the "evolution" of Mac OS X since they undertook the merger of core OS X functionality with iOS with the release of OS 10.7 "Lion"?

Back in the days of SHOCK! HORROR! Classic Mac OS, you could write code that would run on the whole range of their historical product line, from really antique systems to the latest hardware... and I did!

NOT ANYMORE

(that's "progress" for ya)

Bonze Anne Rose Blayk –

Some clarification on my attitude towards the "mistake" –

The excuse that's being made is that the defective SSL/TLS code that was used in the new iOS / OS 10.9 release was the result of a "bad code merge" from the open source using an "automated process" or something like that, and my reflex is to think "that's a wonderful cover story for intentional subversion of a critical security feature."
